The objective of this study was to characterize nurses' attitudes toward patients with major depressive disorder and determine the factors that impact those attitudes. A sample of 199 nurses completed a survey that assessed the patients they treated and the nurses' attitudes toward patients with major depression. Nurses who treated patients with major depression were significantly less likely to agree that depression affects a person's physical appearance and that it interferes with the person's ability to work. They were significantly more likely to agree that depression is caused by personal issues and to agree that depression can be reversed. Nurses were significantly more likely to agree that they would not want to be the patient who has depression if they knew they had it (compared with nurses who did not treat depression). Nurses who rated themselves as lower in social influence and who perceived their role as more psychological expressed more positive attitudes toward patients with major depression. Nurses' attitudes toward patients with major depression are influenced by their level of self-confidence and their role within the organization f678ea9f9e
